GREATEST IMPORTANCE To Our Readers Throughout the West.

Editorial Correspondence. During our investigations and subsequent exposure of numerous medical impostors and fake specialists throughout the West which have occupied the attention of the CHICAGO TRADE REVIEW, we claim no wonderful praise and do not set ourselves up in any pharisaical sense for thus protecting the masses. We have done nothing more nor less than any right-feeling, honest, public-spirited newspapers should do. As we have not been deterred from expressions of disapproval where imposition exists, we will not refrain from praise where praise is fairly and honestly due; where condemnation is proper, such is applied unsparingly, but praise when deserved should also be given without stint. Hence we do not hesitate to single out Dr. J. E. McGrew, of Omaha, Nebraska, as a practitioner fully deserving of the highest praise. Seventeen years' experience gives Dr. McGrew a prestige which added to the general expressions of confidence expressed to the correspondent by leading citizens of Omaha, gives this gentleman a position which is impregnable. The fact that diseases of a private nature are his specialty, gives him a decided advantage over the general practitioner, and wherever inquiry was made among leading merchants, manufacturers, bankers, municipal and county officials and others, the strongest preponderance of testimony showed beyond a doubt that Dr. McGrew does all that he agrees to, that every claim he makes is lived up to fullythat promise and performance go hand in hand. He is a throughly trained physician, a scientist of no uncertain standing, a deep thinker, a keen reasoner, a persistent reader of the literature of his profession, and hence a wide awake and intelligent specialist. He is thus better able to treat certain and definitely named diseases than is the physician who undertakes to treat all diseases-"Jacks of all Trades" are rapidly becoming as unpopular in medicine as they are in other lines of business.

Hence, as a matter of simple justice, we cannot but endorse Dr. McGrew. Those who have written us how they have been imposed upon and swindled will find that Dr. McGrew is as far above such petty deception as the sun is superior to the rushlight, and that his methods are open and aboveboard. During all our investigations we have not encountered a more thorough, a better equipped or more reliable specialist; during our twenty years of experience as correspondent we have never had occasion to comment on a business conducted more in keeping with the principles of square dealing and honor. Hence, upon Dr. McGrew we set the seal of our own approval, and will as a journalist guarantee that every transaction with him will be honestly conducted, as far as he is concerned .- Chicago Trade Journal.

FARMER BROWN'S BAY MARE. A MATTER OF THE Rochester Post-E. ress.

"Pa, take the glass and see if that ain't some one turnin' into our lane? If it's comp'ny comin' I want to know.' Old Daniel Roberts arose from his chair in which it was his fashion to sit tilted back, his head resting on the whitewashed wall of the kitchen, and as it had been his habit to sit in exactly the same place off and on for the last eight or ten years, his head had left its print in a round greasy mark on the wall. Daniel Robert's folks always kept a small field glass with which to scan the road and long lane which led up from it to the farmhouse.

"Why. I do declare, ma! if it ain't Luke Brown an' his wife from Altower! I know that bay mare of their's with the white star in her face!" "You don't say its Browns! Well, now we'll hear all about their Levi's mar-ringe and all the news from over the bay. You'd best be gettin' out to the front to meet 'em, while I hustle round and make things primper. Sarah Meliss Brown keeps her place as neat as a whistle the hull time."

"And how have you kept your health this while past, Mis' Brown?" inquires Mrs. Roberts of her stout, good-natured looking visitor. The men have gone to the barn to "put up" the horses and the women folks are settling down for a

"Oh, fair to middlin', Mis' Roberts. felt the winter pretty much an' then Levi's weddin' came on after, an'we had her folks, aunts an' cousins an' all to our place on the second day, an' I did a deal of bakin' for it, I tell you!' "I was clear astonished," says Mrs Roberts, 'when pa came home an' told me Levi was married—and to Maturle Bell-for when he was to your place in the fall you said his father wouldn't hear to his havin' her at all, not but what I always said to pa that Maturie Beli seemed a good little thing, an' if she an' your Levi was fond of each other, why not let 'em marry?" "Yes, that's what I always said to Luke," interrupted Mrs. Brown, but he wouldn't give in to it at all. He said Levi shouldn't bring her home, an where else could the boy take her? He said she was only fit to read novels an sew her finery an' that she'd never be any help to me, an' he wouldn't have 'round for me to wait on. I said I'd risk all that; for Levi had come to me an' he said to me: 'Mother, couldn't you get father to consent to my marryin Maturie an' to me bringin' her home?' He says, 'Mother, Maturie is stronger than she looks, she does a sight o' work for all her brothers an' her sis ters, an' father needn't think she'll sit still here an' let you do everything. An' besides,' says he, 'mother, I'll never marry anyone else! there aint no use for father to will it. I love Maturie, an' she loves me, an' if father am't willin' why we'll only have to 'bide our time an' perhaps I can get a job to work some one's farm.' 'Now Levi,' I says, 'don't you say a word more. Just you try to humor your father some, an' I'll do my best; bu you know your father's an awful contr'y man sometimes, but don't you go to runnin' off an' leavin the old You are my only boy an' I couldn't let you go.' Well, he said he'd try to be patient an' not cross his father any more than he could help, an' I tried what I could do with Luke, but it was just a waste o' words. He said she hadn't a foot o' land to her name, and that he meant Levi to have the farm an' if he was to get it he must look higher than Maturie Bell. I declare I didn't dare to tell the poor ind at ouce, an' it hap-pened that the very night Luke an' me had had this talk, the barn took fire, You heard tell of it, I s'pose?"

"Yes, I heard it was all burnt, an'

"Yes, I heard it was an the fire, that you lost the bay mare in the fire, that you lost the bay mare in the fire, but that worn't true, o' course. Pa never no particulars. "Well, that's part o' what I'm goin' to tell you bout Levi. You see, Luke has valued that mare above every earthly creatur' on the place, pretty

"I've heard say she was a fine trotter," interrupted her listener.

"Yes, an' Luke has counted on her makin' his fortune for him on that score. Well, this mornin' before the fire two strangers came to look at Star, an' they offered Luke a good price for her, but Luke wouldn't trade. He knew what he was 'bout, an' he knew he could get more than that for her, for those as was judges of horses had 'sured him of it, un' besides he'd been offered more than these strange buyers was willin' to give. He seen that they looked mighty disprointed over not strikin'a bargain for the mare, un'it made him all the surer of her value, so when we was wakened to find the barn all afire with Star in it, I thought Luke would go clear mad. It had got so far ahead there was no savin' it, but he said he'd give most atl he was worth if any one would venture in to save Star. Every one said it couldn't be done, but if Levi didn't start up an' before either of us could stop him, although we hollered to him like mad not to, he plunged right into the flames. I was that crazy when I saw him do it I I hardly knew what I was doin', and his pa was for startin' after him, but some of the neighbors held on to him, and it seemed the longest time when out craw l my poor boy, he was terr'bly scorened an' most suffocated; but thank the Lord, not serious, an' he says 'Father, the mare ain't there; leastways I couldn't find her in her stall,' Well, we concluded the poor thing had broke loose. an' gone to some other part, perhaps right into the fire. Horses are that stupid in fires."

The entrance of the two farmers here cut short Mrs. Brown's story, so she whispered she would finish it later on when they should be alone again. The visitors shortly sat down to as delicious a meal as ever greeted five people with good hearty appetites and honest digestions. The hired man made the fifth at the table, and he ate as if he wished visitors came every day.

"Now, Mis' Brown, do tell me the rest an' however you got the mare? I de-clare I've been that anxious for the men folks to take themselves off a spell. never see them so slow," said Mrs. Roberts to her visitor. The two women sat opposite each other rocking backwards and forwards in their rocking chairs, while through the open windows near them came the smell of the early fruit blossoms—pear and apple and plum. "Well," resumed Mrs. Brown, "the second mornin' after the fire we was sittin' at breakfast. Luke had hardly tasted a bite, but sat there lookin'so glum, when who should drive right past the window, into the yard an' up to the horse block but Maturie Bell an' I guess Luke thought he'd seen a spook sure, for there was Star, our bay mare, hitched to the buggy before her. "Law sakes! Mis' Brown, but how did Maturie come by that?" ejaculated her listener. "Why, the thing's as plain as day-light. You see them horse buyers— norse thieves, I mean—they took the mare out of her stable after we was gone to bed and set fire to the barn, so as to throw us off our track, 'sposin' it wouldn't be found out but what the mare was burnt, too; an' sure enough, we thought she was, although we couldn't find no bones of her next day. Well, of ourse these men got the start, a the next mornin' they was miles back in the country where we knowed no one an' none knowed us. but Providence willed they should stop to Jake Trotter's place for rest an' water an' feed for their horses, an' if Jake Trotter don't happen to be Maturie's own uncle on her mother's side an' Maturie had gone down there to stay a week, so, o' course, she knowed the mare the moment she set eyes on it. Ain't Levi taken her many a ride behind it? Maturie, she got her uncle to question the men quiet an' unsuspicious ike, an' they said as how Star horse they d bought two weeks before of a man named Smith somewhere back in the country. Course they never thought of there bein' any one round as would know they was lyin'. As for Jake Trotter he warn't any the wiser; but Maturie, when she heard this, she says to her uncle, 'Oh! I 'spose I was mistaken in her.' But she knew there wasn't two horses with just exactly them same points as Star, so she just watched her chance an' when the men went off with Trotter to look at a norse he had in a neighbor's barn she slipped in where Star was eatin' an' she called her soft by the pet name Luke calls her by, an' the horse knowed Maturie at once an' whinny'rd to her; so Maturie she made up her mind in a minute an' she just took that norse an' with their hired boy's help-she tole him it was stole an' she knew his rightful owners an' was goin' to take it back to them-she hitched him to her mele's buggy an' off she rode it for all it was worth. She didn't even wait to get a cloak or shawl or anythin for fear her uncle's folks would stop her, an' the hired boy was most scared to death an' said he was 'fraid they'd both be took to 'jail' for norse stealin', but Maturie was so sure it was our horse an' that it was stole from us, that she didn't care. It was awful cold, an' when she got to our place the plucky little thing was just about perished. I tell you, the sight of her blue face an' hands, which was all but froze stiff, just opened father's heart; he couldn't stay set one as had risked her life most to save his horse, an' he just Here, Levi, you can marry her; she's worth any other three girls around after all.' Well, I chafed her han's an Levi kissed her right before us, an said: 'Welcome home, Maturie. An took on so you'd thought we was just about crazy. So now you know the hull story an' between you an' I Luke thinks as much of her today as if she was his own daughter, "Well, ma." said Daniel Roberts to his wife as they sat alone in the kitchen after their visitor's departure, story is just the best one I hev heard in a long time, an' it ain't no wonder that Luke Brown sets so much store by that daughter-in-law of hin."
